

The 3 Types of Wage Increases

There are 3 types of wage increases that happen ...

Structural adjustments may happen when Panera makes a decision to increase pay for a specific reason. For example, an increase may need to be made for some folks in an area where a statutory adjustment was made. You will be told the reason, and it's important that you also communicate to your team why the pay increase happened. It gives team members a feeling of stability and eliminates confusion when they know "the why" behind a pay increase.

Quarterly Heart Check (known as QHC) adjustments should be familiar to you. These are increases tied to performance that happen 3 times a year. The purpose of a QHC adjustment is to reward your team in a meaningful and timely manner. In this course, we'll get into how you do that to boost team morale and keep team members committed to their careers at Panera.

Equity Adjustments also sometimes occur off-cycle from regular wage increases, and there are specific circumstances when these are completed. Staying within the guardrails of the purpose for equity adjustments and not using them improperly is an important aspect of making wage increase decisions.

Your decisions impact

- What you decide to give people during QHC and
- When, why, and how much you compensate someone off-cycle as an equity adjustment

That's why for most of this course, we'll focus on QHC and Equity Adjustment wage increases.
